

When disaster strikes...the lines are open.

At the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) we're constantly preparing for catastrophes: making sure communication channels are available and open to transmit alerts, and acquiring up-to-date geographical information for disaster prediction. When disaster strikes, we're on the ground deploying telecommunication equipment: restoring communication links, establishing telemedicine facilities, and assisting with rescue and recover. Saving lives every way we can.